The specification describes the generation of attenuated bile-sensitive Salmonella strains by exposure to a combination of nalidixic acid and rifampicin. It is not predictable that this teaching would extend to any other species of microorganism. It is not predictable that this teaching would extend to generation of an attenuated strain having sensitivity against microbiostatic agents other than bile. Moreover, it is not predictable that any other microbiostatic agent or combination of such agents would induce a metabolic-drift mutation resulting in an attenuated strain having sensitivity to a further microbiostatic agent. Consequently, claims 1-6, 9-14, 16-19, 29, 31-35, 37-44 are so unclear that no meaningful international search can be carried out on the full scope of those claims.

Furthermore, claims 1-6, 9-14 16-19, 29, 31-35, 37-44 fail to define the subject matter for which protection is sought in terms of the technical features of the invention (Rule 6.3(a)).
